INDIANS TO FORM A TRUST.

Penobscots of Maine Object to White Men Marrying Into the Tribe.

Old Town, Me.—The long fight between the old party and the new party in the Indian tribe which is colonized on Indian Island regarding the admission of whites who have married Indians to full privileges in the tribe, culminated last week in an open row. The members of the old party withdrew from the tribal council and have applied for articles of incorporation under the laws of Maine.

They intend to form an Indian trust, of which all persons having one-half Indian blood can own one share. No portion of the stock will be sold to white persons on any terms. The object of the incorporation is to force Madame Bishop and a few other whites who have married Indians to quit the island, and to prevent them from sharing in any of the bounties and trust funds which the state has given the Indians.

The state holds about $50,000 in trust for the Penobscot tribe, which is at interest at 5 per cent. The income goes to the support of those who live on the island. In addition to this fixed sum the tribe receives about $10,000 per year from shore rents from their lands, from bounties on their crops and from the sale of timber and grass.

With about $13,000 a year coming for the maintenance of some 300 persons, the life of an Old Town Indian became a long, sweet dream, which made the squaws desirable in the matrimonial market to such adventurous white men as wished to live without labor. For two or three years the squaws had their pick among the white swains of eastern Maine.

It was soon found that such marriages diminished the individual revenues which came to members of the tribe, and there was a violent shaking up, resulting in a division of the tribe into two parties. The old party stood for the Indian blood, and the new party believed in a liberal admixture of white stock. The battle has gone on with varying results for some years. When all arguments had failed the old party played its last card and will make the colony into a corporation, as the Old town Indian association, limited.
